Allen Dulles Here Foresees
Russia Free Some Day

Allen W. Dulles, whose diplomatic service antedates the Bolshevik Revolution, said Wednesday he foresees the day when Russia will renounce Marxism-Leninism and establish a form of freedom.

The former chief of the Central Intelligence Agency told a Hartford press conference that such a change, however, is years away.

He saw the minor revolts by Russian artists, poets, and intellectuals as contributing to the breakdown of communism's hold on the Russian citizen.

Once men's minds are liberated, he said, the desire for freedom "common to every man" springs up.

"THEREFORE, in dogma," said the professorial-looking diplomat, "Peking is much more right than Moscow. Communism requires a tight hold on its people."

Mr. Dulles, in introductory remarks, praised the "far-reaching" work of the Foreign Policy Association of Greater Hartford which had invited him to deliver the William Ainsworth Greene memorial lecture later that evening in West Hartford.

In response to reporters' questions, Mr. Dulles:

Praised the Brazil revolt, without which, he said, the country would have fallen to communism.

Said there is little danger of Castro's being deposed "in the short run."

MR. DULLES saw the chief danger facing America not as nuclear war but as subversion of countries in the free world.

While saying the United States is narrowing the gap between herself and Russia in outer space pursuits, he stressed the lack of coincident preparation to meet Communist infiltration.

This will be overcome only if a mass education of Americans to the continuing menace of communism is undertaken, he said.
